OUR HISTORY

Yokota Air Base (YAB) has a rich history that spans seven decades, with 2010 marking the base's 70th anniversary.

Imperial Japanese Army Air Period: 1940-45

YAB was originally constructed by the Imperial Japanese Army as Tama Airfield which was activated on 15 August 1940. During World War II, it was a training base and secret aircraft test and development center, with the U.S. only learning its existence through reconnaissance in late 1944.As a result, the base suffered minimal damage during World War II. This allowed Americans to use many of YAB's wartime facilities such as the old operations building a structure that survived until fairly recently.

Occupation Period: 1945-51

The first Americans to arrive at YAB - a handful of the 1st Calvary Division soldiers led by a 1 LT- took pos- session of the base on 3 September 1945, and Major Benjamin Hayes accepted the surrender sword from Major General Yamaguchi Tsuchio on 6 September. About ten days later, the first American airplanes landed at Yokota: C-46s from the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th Combat Cargo Squadrons, ferrying supplies and men for the occupation. By the end of 1945, the original runway had become unusable, and for nearly a year construction crews rebuilt and extended the runway for B-29s. During this time, units assigned to YAB flew out of nearby Tachikawa and Johnson Air Bases. On 15 August 1946, YAB AF Commander Major General Kenneth Wolfe arrived in a B-17, followed by 15 A-26s from the 3rd Bomb Group. Soon after, various units began flight operations here, including recon, air rescue and weather.

Dependents began arriving at YAB in August 1946 but had to live in hotels while waiting for on-base housing to be completed. Children initially attended school in Yokota's Chapel. Along with Stars and Stripes, YAB's chief form of information was the base paper then called Third Strike.

It was briefly renamed Plane Talk, and then Flight Lines in 1950, Afterburner in the mid-1950s and Fuji Flyer in 1970. FEN Tokyo (now AFN) radio went on the air in September 1945, and though there were on-base movie theaters, there was still no TV at this time. Phone calls home remained a rare luxury for decades.

Korean War Period: 1950-53

At the outbreak of the Korean War in June 1950, Yokota's fortunes changed dramatically. Among the numerous bases in Japan, YAB was chosen as headquarters for the newly formed FEAF Bomber Command and was also home to B-29 squadrons that flew regular missions to Korea. The Yokota-based bombing missions continued for three years, helping to bring about the ceasefire that eventually allowed South Korea to freely develop into the economic powerhouse it is today.

Cold War Period: Post-Korean War to 1965

The Air Force's dominant symbol of the Cold War, SAC, made its appearance at YAB in 1956 when it established a detachment of the 3rd Air Division to handle B-36, B-47 and B-52 bomber rotations. At the same time, YAB had significant fighter, recon and light bomber operations. The 56th WRS chased typhoons from YAB using WB-29s, WB- 50s and later WC-130s and WB-47s. Meanwhile, the first C-130s, used for recon (6091st SRS), arrived in April 1961. In 1962, F-102 "Delta Daggers" from the 40th FIS and the YAB flightline were filmed for the Japanese monster movie Mothra, though the F-102 footage was not used.

Since the Korean War and into the present, Yokota's residents have actively cultivated positive relations with our Japanese hosts through open houses, participation in festivals and friendship societies, supporting charities such as orphanages and assisting nearby communities in times of drought and other natural disasters. Local community relations have been an important part of Yokota's history.
